

Opal learns that being kind and curious helps her make friends in her new town. When Opal meets Gloria Dump, an older woman who many kids are afraid of, she says, "I just stood there and listened, real careful, and that's how I found out she was friendly." This shows that Opal makes friends by giving people a chance and listening without judging them. Her kindness allows her to connect with others and feel less alone in a new place.

The cell membrane is essential because it controls what enters and leaves the cell. According to the textbook Life Science

Today, "The cell membrane acts as a selective barrier, allowing only certain substances to pass through."

This shows that without the cell membrane, harmful substances could enter and vital materials could escape, making it impossible for the cell to survive and maintain balance.

The rocky soil and coastal location of the New England colonies shaped their economy and lifestyle.

According to historian David McCullough, "New England settlers turned to fishing, shipbuilding, and small-scale farming because the land was too rough for large plantations." This means that geography pushed colonists to develop industries suited to their environment, which influenced their trade, work habits, and community structure.
